on point wears one man would not be on a job where two men ought to be. Fourth, because the public would receive better accommodations, and travel would be safer. Are these not valued reasons? Is life so cheap in America as to be continually souffed out on our railroads? I am not speaking as a layman, but as one who has had many years of experience in different classes of railroad work, and I am fully convinced that the final solution will be for the government to take in charge the railroads of America.

DUVAL PORTER,

Two Sentences,

To the Editor of The Times-Dispatch:

Sir.—Aubrey Barner, a white man twenty-one years of age, was found guilty of attempting criminal assault upon a ten-year-old girl. Barker had appeared in court without counsel, and Judge R. Carter Scott designated two lawyers to defend him. The principal witnesses against Barker were the little girl and her mother. The jury required a verdict of guilty, and Barker was sentenced to two years' hard labor.

Stephen R. Mallory.
Please tell me where Stephen Mallory. Confederate Secretary of the Navy, was born, and when and from what part of the country his people came.
He was the son of a Connecticut family. His father was a trading schooner captain, and Mallory was born at Trinidad in 1810. The father died in 1821, while his vessel was at Key West, and the widow sold out and opened a hotel there, where Mallory spent most of his youth. He went to New York and Connecticut to be educated, came back to Key West, studied law, and began practice in 1832. Jackson appointed him inspector at Key West, and he resigned that office to become county judge, and then probate judge of Monroe. Folk appointed him to be collector at Key West in 1845, and he was United States Senator from 1851 to the secession of Florida.
